- 5. Summary/Purpose: This billis designed to promote public bodies' use of alte rnativedispute resolution techniques rather than the courts when seeking to resolve disputes without her parties. Inaddition, the bill requires that state agencies, which it defines a sunits of stategovernment empoweredtoissueregulationsordecideca ses, develop written policies addressing the use of disputeresolution proceedings, train any necessary employees about the implementation of such procedures, designate an existing or new employee as the agency's disputeresolution coordinator, andreview their existing policies, procedures, and regulations to evaluate whether they encourage theuseofthedisputeresolutionproceedings. If the agency's policies, procedures, and regulations donotencouragetheuseofdisputeresolutionproceedings, thebi llrequiresthattheagency amendthoseitemssothattheydoencouragetheuseofsuchpractices. Finally, the billestablishes an Interagency Dispute Resolution Advisory Council, which is to be composed of two dispute and the control of the council ofresolution coordinators from eachs ecretariat, the Director of the Department of Employment DisputeResolution, and three persons not employed by the Commonwealth, which are to be appointed by the Governor. This council is to conduct training seminars and education programs concerningdisp uteresolutionproceedings, publisheducation materials on the topic, and report on itsactivities, including recommended changes in the law, to the Governor and General Assembly.

- 8. Fiscalimplications: Although it is difficult to determine this legislation's fiscalimpact with any certainty, it could result in additional costs for both the Common wealth and its state agencies. These additional costs could include:
 - the costs associated with any state agency's participation in an alternative dispute resolution proceeding;
 - the costs associated with state agencies' development of written policies addressing the uses of alternative disputeres olution proceedings;
 - the costs of training for state employees involved in implementing these policies;

- the costs associated with reviewing state agencies' existing policies, procedures, and regulations in order to determine if those same items must be a mended to encourage the use of alternative disputeres olution techniques; and
- the costs associated with the proposed Interagency Dispute Resolution Advisory Council.

Althoughthislegislationdoesnotrequirethatstateagenc iesparticipateinspecificdispute resolution proceedings, it does require that all state agencies develop a written policy addressing theuse of alternative disputeres olution proceedings, provide training to those employees involvedinimplementingthat policy, and review their existing policies, procedures, and regulationstodeterminewhetheramendmentsareneededtothoseitemstoauthorizeand encouragetheuseofdisputeresolutionproceedings.Potentially,theserequirementscould increasethosea gencies' operating costs. For instance, the Department of Health has indicated thatitmightneedanadditionalpositiontoreviewthatagency's numerous policies, procedures, andregulations. This position would also be responsible for acting as the dis coordinatorforthatagencyuntilthoseactivitiesarefullyoperational.Otherlargeagencieswith multiplepolicies, procedures, and regulations might be similarly affected. Furthermore, since all stateagenciesaresupposedtoprovide trainingtothoseemployeesinvolvedwithimplementing theiralternative disputeres olution policies, agencies are likely to incurad ditional costs because thesetrainingcoursesarenormallyofferedonlyforafeebystateagenciesandprivatesector firms.

Inaddition, theremay be instances in which the use of other agencies's taffas "neutrals" in alternative disputeres olution proceedings is in appropriate. For example, in a highly technical dispute, a state agency may be unable to locate another state employee with the policy or regulatory background necessary to serve as "neutral" in the matter. Moreover, the other party involved in the proceeding may not agree to the use of a state employee as a "neutral" in the dispute. If such problems ar een countered, state agencies may need to hir eprofession al mediators, ombuds men, or facilitators to assist in the seproceedings. Those additional costs could be in excess of the lost productivity of the staff involved in the alternative disputeres olution proceeding.

Furthermore, the rewill be minor costs associated with the proposed Interagency Dispute Resolution Advisory Committee. For example, because three members of this committee are required to be persons not in the employment of the Commonweal th, these individuals will most likely be paid per diempayments to cover their necessary expenses. In addition, this committee is responsible for developing training programs and printing publications concerning alternative disputeres olutioned ucation, it sactivities, and recommended changes to the Code of Virginia.

Finally, it should be noted that there is a potential fiscal benefit associated with this legislation. By relying upon alternative disputeres olution proceedings, state agencies may be able to avoid more costly court - imposed solutions to their disputes with other parties. However, whether these potentials a ving sout weight he potential costs associated with this measure is difficult to predict.

- 9. Specificagencyorpolitical subdivisions affected: This bill would affect all legislative bodies, authorities, boards, bureaus, commissions, districts, political subdivisions, or agencies of the Commonweal the xcept the courts system.
- 10. Technicalamendmentnecessary:No.
- 11. Othercomments: None.
