WHEREAS, in the early 1980s, four women professionals from India and Bangladesh living in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area discussed the problem of domestic abuse in their community; these discussions grew into the incorporation of ASHA for Women in 1989; and

WHEREAS, operated by a network of volunteers, ASHA for Women connects its clients with the government and community resources available to victims of domestic violence, such as mental health counseling, educational support, transportation, and legal counseling, helping them escape dangerous situations and achieve financial and personal independence; and
