Offered January 21, 1999

Establishing a joint subcommittee to study the need for a college in South-central Virginia.

Patrons—Hawkins, Chichester, Couric, Houck, Lucas, Newman, Reynolds, Saslaw, Trumbo and Woods;
Delegates: Abbitt, Bennett, Bryant, Byron, Clement, Diamonstein, Dudley, Putney and Ruff

Referred to Committee on Rules

WHEREAS, since Colonial days, Virginians have demonstrated a "thirst for knowledge and a reverence for learning," which resulted in the establishment of schools and universities in the Commonwealth; and

WHEREAS, Thomas Jefferson is credited with developing Virginia's plan for a system of public education, which provided for elementary schools, general or secondary schools, and a university; and

WHEREAS, with the establishment of the College of William and Mary in 1624 by the crown of England, and with the enactment of legislation appropriating funds for the University of Virginia in February 1818, Virginia was well on its way to creating a high quality and effective system of higher education composed of state-supported colleges and universities; and

WHEREAS, today, Virginia's system of higher education includes public and private two- and four-year, comprehensive and doctoral institutions which offer a range of fields and disciplines from the associate degree to the post-doctoral level, and educational opportunities in the professional schools; and

WHEREAS, it has been the long-standing goal of the Commonwealth to ensure that opportunities for higher education are accessible and available to all citizens in the most practicable, feasible, and cost-efficient manner; and

WHEREAS, although the South-central region of the Commonwealth is served by the community college system, there also is the need for a comprehensive or doctoral institution which could be easily accessed by citizens in the area; and

WHEREAS, the location of a comprehensive or doctoral institution in South-central Virginia would facilitate economic development, foster community growth, promote the appreciation of the cultural and historical significance of the region and enhance educational opportunities for all citizens through partnerships with public schools, business, government, and other local, state, and federal entities; and

WHEREAS, the costs of providing access to the advantages and benefits of a comprehensive or doctoral institution in South-central Virginia need not be prohibitive, as such educational services could be provided on a regional basis; and

WHEREAS, the State of Florida has explored the regional university concept to provide greater access to college degree programs in its unserved areas, and the design and approach of Florida and other states in this regard should be considered; and

WHEREAS, establishing a comprehensive or doctoral institution in the South-central area would complement Virginia's fine tradition and is consistent with the Commonwealth's legacy and vision to ensure the "broadest diffusion of knowledge"; now, therefore, be it
