Referred to Committee on Rules

WHEREAS, a number of studies have established that frail elderly and disabled individuals desire to live in their homes rather than in an institutional setting; and

WHEREAS, the Joint Legislative Audit and Review Commission's 2005 report, "Impact of An Aging Population on State Agencies," found that "informal caregivers, such as family and friends, provide the majority of care to older people who need assistance" and that "the assistance provided by informal caregivers often allows individuals to remain in their homes and communities by preventing or delaying the need for institutional care"; and

WHEREAS, there are currently an estimated 700,000 informal caregivers in Virginia providing 793 million caregiving hours per year; and

WHEREAS, many informal caregivers work and must balance work and caregiving thereby needing the help of community-based services, such as adult day care, home health, personal care, etc.; and

WHEREAS, the Joint Legislative Audit and Review Commission's 2005 report indicated that many communities in the Commonwealth lacked sufficient community-based services; and

WHEREAS, family caregivers must take care of themselves in order to provide the care needed for their loved ones, respite care for them is a much needed service; and

WHEREAS, the Governor's Commission on Health Care Reform in its report recognized the need for support of family caregivers and community-based caregiver organizations; and recommended a study be done that would assist the Secretary of Health and Human Resources and legislators in identifying policies, resources, and funding to enrich these resources and ensure an adequacy of services as long-term care demands increase; now, therefore, be it
